

child development 9-12 months

Your baby is moving around now and the pace of life has quickened somewhat. This may suit you if you found the tiny baby stage restrictive. He will be 'talking' and making recognisable sounds and he will really love you talking to him and repeating single words clearly.

He may be clingy and wary of strangers but he is forming special relationships with family members and his personality will be becoming clear to you.

Social and emotional development

It is usually in these three months that your baby begins to understand his very special relationship with you, and with friends and relatives. He starts to know that when you go away, you will come back again, and that you are still there even when he cannot see you. No wonder 'peek-a-boo' and 'hiding' are favourite games because they play out in a simple way the comings and goings of people that your baby has come to recognise and depend upon. He also has some understanding that you see him and that he can hide from you, although he still thinks that if he can't see you, you can't see him. He starts to understand that he is a person, and he can recognise himself in the mirror.

He will have developed some definite ideas about what he likes and does not like. He may kick and resist nappy change time or other restrictions on his freedom.

He will smile and babble and try to engage you in a conversation and copy simple hand games like 'clap hands' or 'bye bye'. In other words he is becoming aware of himself as a social creature. He understands the meaning of 'no', although he is going to spend the next eighteen months checking its meaning exactly!

The down side of all this is that he is frightened when you leave him and will cling and cry, and (very sensibly) be wary of strangers.

Moving around

The big break through in motor development is that she will move all on her own. She might pull herself along with her arms, roll around or crawl on all fours. During this time she will start to pull herself to standing and support her weight while holding on to you or to furniture. Some babies will start to walk by themselves during these months, although many won't walk for a few months yet.

It's a big thing to see your baby 'standing on her own two feet', probably holding on and not walking quite yet, but vertical nevertheless. If you have loved the tiny baby stage you may have some sadness when your baby starts to look like a child or else you may be relieved to see the promise of some independence to come.

Safety is a big issue when babies start to move around by themselves. You need to baby-proof your house and make sure all poisons and dangerous items are locked away up high. Put things that she might break well out of reach too. She can't stop herself from touching anything that looks interesting.

Her fine motor skills are improving quickly too. She can pick up an object with her thumb and fingers rather than grabbing with the palm of her hand. She pokes and points with her finger and transfers objects from one hand to another. She cannot however control putting things down and she has to drop to release objects from her grasp. She will still put anything she holds into her mouth and now that she can pick up small things this can be a risk time for swallowing dangerous objects or choking.

She will be able to sit on her own for quite long times and will enjoy exploring objects and the sounds she can make with them while sitting on the floor.

She will be feeding herself in her high chair although she may often be more interested in squishing and feeling than the actual eating bit. She is also able to drink out of a cup with a spout without help.

Talking

He has got the idea of conversations now and even though he may not have any recognisable words he will 'chat' away with the right inflexion in his voice. He may be saying simple sounds like 'mumum' and 'daddad'. He recognises several words and may shake his head for 'no'.

He is not making the huge variety of sounds that he was in earlier months because his sounds are more specific to his native tongue. He begins to drop (for instance) those European sounds deep in the back of his throat for more English, front of mouth sounds, (if English is his native tongue).

He begins to love music and rhymes and he will bounce and sway to the rhythm and he will love the repetition of songs that help him to learn that language in itself is a musical thing. Babies can be very interested in books now (see 'Reading with babies').

Activities for the 9-12 months old

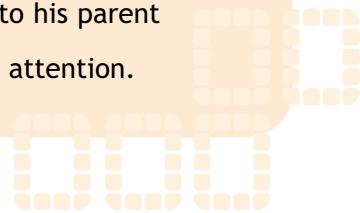

- make her a kitchen cupboard of her own to open and shut the door
- give her pots and spoons to bang
- sing songs and repeat phrases
- bounce her and sing
- look at simple books with clear pictures in them
- play 'hiding' behind the couch or curtains
- talk to her a lot
- sit her on the floor with her toys
- encourage her to push a trolley with bricks in it
- cuddle and roll on the floor.

Children of this age still like being with people best of all, but they are starting to have some interest in toys that do something, like move or make a noise.

What to watch out for

Seek help from your health professional if your baby by 12 months is not:

- pulling himself up to stand
- moving around somehow
- changing objects from one hand to another
- looking up when you call his name
- copying simple sounds like 'mummm'
- showing signs of being especially attached to his parent
- smiling, laughing and trying to attract your attention.

Summary

Social emotional

A baby usually:

- is well aware of strangers and familiar people and withdraws from strangers
- may not even go to familiar people for a while - demanding the primary caregiver
- gives cuddles by 10 months
- enjoys peek-a-boo games.

There may be a problem if a baby:

- does not show pleasure when she sees familiar people
- does not show anxiety when separated from her main caregiver.

Motor skills

A baby usually:

- can move around by crawling or bottom shuffling by 10 months
- can lean over while sitting without falling over
- can pull up to standing by 10 to 11 months
- walks with hands held by 10 to 12 months.

There may be a problem if a baby:

- is not sitting by 9 to 10 months
- is not starting to move around by any means.

Understanding

A baby usually:

- is interested in small objects and reaches out for them
- starts to look at and feel objects before taking them to his mouth
- looks in the correct direction for things that have fallen down.

There may be a problem if a baby:

- is not interested in new objects.

Speech and language

A baby usually:

- is putting strings of babble sounds together
- shakes head for 'no' by about 10 months
- recognises several words including own name (e.g. looks for daddy if 'daddy' is said)
- imitates sounds made by other people.

There may be a problem if:

- babbling has not become more complex and baby does not babble in 'conversation' with others.
